I have been using Adobe's PDF software for years. It's all fine and all, but sometimes you simply need a faster, better alternative. So what are you really paying for when you buy a standalone application? I found PDF creator a few years ago on www.hhttp://www.free-pdf-viewer.net/main/home.html and installed it on my PC. It was good enough that I added it to my blog. Soon, others found it and asked me to give it a try. I then uploaded all of my post PDFs to www.free-pdf-viewer.net and people downloaded it. I even released the program under the GPL and was nominated for Linux Journal's Best of Linux Software category. www.free-pdf-viewer.net is a site that showcases software made by various programmers who wanted to provide a free solution to the PDF problem. What they usually do, is release the software on a site like www.gnu.org and provide a download. They offer a program for free, but don't make much money from it. Why are they doing this? I have a lot of programs like this. I have written two open source document converters, as well. They aren't exactly new and I've found them to be useful. However b7e8fdf5c8
